Description :

Prsentation de l'diteur*In depth analysis of the life of Joseph Goebbels*Several pictures of Joseph Goebbels and the Third Reich*Table of contents"If you tell a lie big enough and keep repeating it, people will eventually come to believe it. The lie can be maintained only for such time as the State can shield the people from the political, economic and/or military consequences of the lie. It thus becomes vitally important for the State to use all of its powers to repress dissent, for the truth is the mortal enemy of the lie, and thus by extension, the truth is the greatest enemy of the State."These words, spoken by the Nazi Minister of Propaganda, Joseph Goebbels, are perhaps the clearest illustration of the mans character and priorities. In many ways he was the perfect fit for his job, combining his love of words and culture, his impressive education, and his rampant anti-Semitism and support of Adolf Hitler into one powerful position. Joseph Goebbels had a relatively peaceful childhood and had no obvious motivation for the path he chose in life, aside from a life-long injury that caused him to feel physically inferior to his siblings and many people he encountered throughout life. He was never an official member of the military, and instead chose to focus on writing and the fine arts throughout school and adulthood. These pursuits served him well as a member of the Third Reich. Goebbels was incredibly loyal to Hitler from nearly the very first days of his interaction with the Nazi Party. He never stopped believing in the mission or the future plans for Germany, even if he was not always in agreement with other Nazi officials for how to achieve these goals. Like many in Hitlers inner circle, he participated in plans on more than one occasion to undermine his colleagues, but he never once believed that Hitler was not the most worthy leader for the party and the country. Goebbels is perhaps best known for his role in the Nazi book burning ceremonies. Though the idea to destroy books was not his, he embraced a state controlled collection of literature and culture, no matter the cost. When the largest book burning ceremonies were held, Goebbels attended and spoke at the ceremony in Berlin. The burnings served, at least in part, as a catalyst for Goebbels complete control of all forms of art, media, and culture during the reign of the Nazis in Germany. Ultimately, his loyalty to Hitler brought him, his wife, and his six children to the same fate as the Fuhrer. He died at his own hand in the same bunker, just a few days after the death of Hitler. Adolf Hitler is typically accepted as the face of the Third Reich and Nazism, but there was actually a man behind Hitler, helping to create the agenda and public perception of the movement. Joseph Goebbels, born Paul Joseph Goebbels, was a politician and one of Hitlers Reich ministers, was one of the Fuhrers closest associates. Few were more intensely anti-Semitic, a factor that aided in his design of powerful propaganda campaigns as the Reichs Minister of Propaganda. Goebbels did more than just talk the talk of anti-Semitism; he truly believed the faulty science used to justify the Holocaust. He was considered one of the most intelligent men in Hitlers inner circle, and was one of the most educated and cultured. Even his enemies considered him intelligent and crafty. Young Joseph grew up in the industrial town of Rheydt. His father worked as a factory clerk and his mother stayed at home with the five Goebbels children, following a brief bout as a farmhand. The Goebbels family was catholic, though Joseph would abandon his association with the faith early in his university career. Joseph was the youngest of three boys and had two younger sisters. The youngest in the family, Maria, eventually married German filmmaker Max W. Kimmich. In this book you will take an in depth look at the life of Joseph Goebbels, what made him the man he was, and how he contributed to the agenda of the Third Reich.
